11. (U) The public prosecution June 7 released Ali Saeed Al Khabaz and Hameed Yousif Ahmed from custody after prosecutors became convinced of their innocence based upon eyewitness reports. Al Khabaz and Ahmed had been detained during a violent protest the night of May 21 in the Shia village of Sanabis. Security personnel reportedly beat them after their detention, resulting in injuries that caused both men to be admitted into the Bahrain Defense Force hospital (Ref A). According to Al Wasat newspaper, the two were released as a result of a meeting the day before between Interior Minister Shaikh Rashid bin Abdullah Al Khalifa and Shia opposition society Al Wifaq secretary general and parliamentary deputy Shaikh Ali Salman. Al Wifaq spokesman Jassim Al Moamen said, "The society (Al Wifaq) highly appreciates the decision of the Minister and calls on him to release the rest of the detainees (who were picked up during other demonstrations)." Al Moamen added that the two men would continue to receive medical treatment for their injuries.

12. (C) Comment: The case of Al Khabaz and Ahmed became a bit too hot for the government, with the international media covering reports of a Human Rights Watch call for an independent commission to investigate the source of the two detainees' injuries. By releasing the two following the meeting with Salman, the government seeks to ease some of the pressure while also allowing credit to go to Al Wifaq, which is part of the political system, and not the hardline Shia Haq Movement. In a likely quid pro quo, Salman in his June 8 Friday prayer sermon urged the public to abide by laws regulating gatherings and protests rather than having an "uncontrollable security situation."
